

Health and National Security

19 - 21 October 2022

Overview

The significant strategic impact of COVID-19 has meant health is now front of mind for many national security policy and decision makers.

This program aims to explore the nexus between health and national security, and how national security policy and decision makers might sensibly factor health into strategic thinking in the future.

Participants will be encouraged to take a deep dive into health (and related existential threats) as a construct of national security.

Audience

APS and equivalent staff recognised as emerging thinkers across government and the national security community with a basic understanding of both health and national security. Content will be at the unclassified level.

Details

Venue: In person, Crawford Building (132a), Lennox Crossing, ANU

Cost: $4,050 (GST ex) A discount will be applied for participants from Participating Agencies

Enrol / enquire: T 02 6125 2233 | E epd.nsc@anu.edu.au

Presenters include

Professor Paul Arbon, Director of the Torrens Resilience Initiative, Flinders University

Professor Catherine Bennett, Chair in Epidemiology, Deakin University

Professor Sotiris Vardoulakis, Professor of Global Environmental Health, ANU College of Health and Medicine